

Umpei Fude

HANDMADE CALLIGRAPHY BRUSHES

AMEICO

A close-up photograph of a person's hands performing Japanese calligraphy. The person is wearing a dark kimono with a vibrant floral pattern of pink and white flowers. They are holding a traditional brush with a light-colored wooden handle and a dark, pointed tip. The brush is positioned over a white sheet of paper that is laid flat on a dark wooden surface. The paper has a black border. On the paper, there are two large, bold Japanese characters written in black ink. The first character is '日' (sun) and the second is '本' (origin/essence). The brush is currently in the process of writing the second character.

THE ART OF THE BRUSH

The Umpei Fude brush traces its origins back more than 400 years to Japan's early Edo period. The Fujino family began crafting brushes in Kyoto during the Genna era (1615–1624), developing refined techniques for handmade calligraphy brushes used by scholars, artists, Buddhist monks, and even the Imperial Court. Over generations, the family became known as "Umpei," and today the workshop continues in Shiga Prefecture, preserving these traditional methods.

Respected for their meticulous craftsmanship, Umpei Fude brushes are still used today for traditional Japanese calligraphy (shodō), ink painting, restoration work, and by artists who value the expressive line quality and responsiveness of handmade brushes. Around the world, they are admired as functional art objects that embody centuries of Japanese craftsmanship and cultural heritage.
